Women, But Not Dolphins, Find Eggs When They Dive WASHINGTON, D.C. – Scientists studying human female ovulation have revealed that the way women reach orgasm is different from that of most species. They can predict a woman’s fertile window based on the depth of her diving and the angle of her gaze. A study of female bottlenose dolphins performed over several years at SeaWorld marine parks in the Pacific Northwest showed that during the summer the animals found eggs in their feces at a depth of 67 to 80 feet, or 21 to 26 meters. The scientists say no other species is known to dive as deep as dolphins. The researchers also found that the dolphins moved their snouts down about 4 inches during their dives. No other species has been observed to do that. “Our finding represents the first indication of female dolphins enjoying sex while underwater by digging in the mud,” said SeaWorld’s senior vice president of zoological research, Marcia Paskins. “Humans and other animals, such as dogs and cats, get off by making contact with an object. Dolphins, on the other hand, like to straddle their prey before giving it a bite. When bottlenose dolphins, at least, have sex in the water, it’s on their terms.” The scientists suggest this adaptation might allow the dolphins to avoid predators.
