[b]The CodeLoader tool allows you to use LMX and LMK devices through a USB port or a LPT port. All the information is shown in real time, so you can use it in real time. It's designed to let you read and write all the configuration you want to the device as a firmware upgrade. [b]The thing is that the application not only provides information on the bytes you need to read but also what bytes you need to write to the device to change the configuration.[/b] [b]For example, if you want to change the LED driver to blink once per second, you can do it in only 5 bytes of information.[/b] [b]Or if you want to change the LED to flash through the BIOS (BIOS flash) you can do it in 3 bytes of information.[/b] [b]CodeLoader is designed to read and write the bytes that are needed in order to create the proper configuration for the device. [b]There are many ways to flash the configuration you want. Each way of flashing, of course, contains the bytes that are needed to make it work. [b]So, when you want to change the LED driver to a period of 1 second, the bytes you will need to read and write to the device are the following: When you want to change the LED to a period of 0.1 seconds, the bytes you will need to read and write to the device are the following: When you want to flash the BIOS, the bytes you will need to read and write to the device are the following: When you want to create a period of 1 second when the LED is on, the bytes you will need to read and write to the device are the following: When you want to create a period of 0.1 seconds when the LED is on, the bytes you will need to read and write to the device are the following: [b]Or you can do what I did: [b]I created a method to handle all the configurations I could make with the LMX and LMK devices. [b]I called this method flash_configuration.[/b] [b]You can call this method with any configuration you can make with the device. [b]It can be called from another method that uses the bytes you need to flash the device with the configuration you want to use.[/b]
