Ornithine decarboxylase, a key enzyme in the biosynthesis of polyamines is highly expressed in rapidly proliferating cells, as well as in hepatocytes undergoing regenerative processes after chemical or toxic injury. Polyamines have pleiotropic effects in proliferating cells, and their accumulation causes modifications in many cellular functions. Since experimental liver injury is followed by the appearance of ornithine decarboxylase in hepatocytes, we investigated whether polyamines have a role in this process. Male rats were treated with alpha-difluoromethylornithine, an irreversible inhibitor of ornithine decarboxylase. On day 14, livers were submitted to quantitative histological, biochemical and immunohistochemical analysis. Treatment with alpha-difluoromethylornithine was associated with decreased ornithine decarboxylase activity and histological and biochemical indices of liver injury. However, both ornithine decarboxylase activity and its expression in hepatocytes were significantly increased in animals treated with alpha-difluoromethylornithine 24 hours before liver injury. Ornithine decarboxylase expression occurred in hepatocytes with morphological signs of necrosis and increased cell proliferation. Treatment with alpha-difluoromethylornithine was associated with decreased polyamine accumulation in hepatocytes. The data suggest that ornithine
